Start off with café con leche at the classic Café de Tacuba, on the street of the same name. Continuing west along Calle Tacuba, you'll find the Museo Nacional de Arte, a palace of early Mexican art that's well worth exploring. If you're around on a Tuesday or Sunday evening, catch a lucha libre (wrestling) bout at the Arena Coliseo, six blocks north of the hotel on República de Perú.

As I was typing this, I decided to google what we saw. Who knows, right? Well, lo and behold, I found an explanation! Apparently, it's called La Isla de las Muñecas (Island of the Dolls). The story goes that the island was haunted by a spirit soon after a little girl had drowned nearby. Don Julian, the previous caretaker, hung a doll on a tree to appease her ghost. News spread, more dolls were sent by people from around the world. Don Julian's family is carrying on the tradition at present. Where's Chucky?

Ciudadela: a dozen temples

The Ciudadela is a huge enclosure located at the geographic center of the city. It measures about 400 m on a side (i.e. about 160,000 m²), and the interior space is surrounded by four large platforms surmounted by pyramids. The main plaza had a capacity of about 100,000 persons without much crowding (Cowgill 1983). One of the main functions of this closed huge space may have been ritual performance.

Feathered Serpent Pyramid was the central pyramid of this large complex. Adorned with large sculptural heads, it was one of the most monumental structures in Teotihuacan. A major portion of the principal facade of the pyramid was later covered by the Adosada platform; afterward, the Feathered Serpent Pyramid was not clearly visible to people standing on the main plaza, as is shown in this photo.

Two apartment compounds adjacent to this monument, called the North Palace (photo) and South Palace, were apparently provided residential space and/or administrative offices for elites. Both palaces were completely excavated and consolidated by the Proyecto Arqueológico Teotihuacán 1980-82
